

Rare-gas clusters show in experiments an extremely effective absorption of energy from short intensive laser pulses at optical wave lengths. We discuss the mechanisms of the laser-cluster interaction on the basis of microscopic studies of clusters with about 1000 atoms. The observed collective dynamics of the electrons in the expanding cluster enables resonant absorption.

Furthermore we give an outlook to the response of clusters to intensive lasers in the X-ray regime.