

Ultrashort soft X-ray pulses generated as high harmonics of few-cycle laser pulses are ideal probes for following the evolution of electronic processes in atoms. The combination of shortness and high photon energy, together with perfect synchronization with respect to a visible laser field, enables a novel class of pump-probe experiments. Using electron- as well as ion detection, extremely fast electronic correlation can directly be followed in the time-domain